Pizza Hut Serves Up A Slice Of Data Breach

Pizza Hut has become the latest household name to suffer a payment card breach.

The company admitted the incident on Saturday in an email sent to affected customers, nearly two weeks after it discovered and remediated the issue. According to the email, shared on social media by some recipients, affected customers placed orders on the company's mobile app or website for about 28 hours between the morning of October 1 and midday on October 2.

The “temporary security intrusion” resulted in hackers accessing names, billing ZIP codes, delivery addresses, email addresses and payment card information (account numbers, expiration dates and CVV numbers).
