YouTube Suffers Music Video Hack

Popular streaming service YouTube has suffered a hack of a number of its high-profile music videos, according to reports. As detailed by the BBC, the videos for several hit songs, including 'Despacito', have been defaced – the Despacito video has since been removed but the cover image featured a group wearing masks and pointing guns, whilst other videos are supposed to still be live. “The hackers, calling themselves Prosox and Kuroi'sh, had written 'Free Palestine' underneath the videos,” stated the BBC. Mark James, security specialist at ESET, said the details currently surrounding the hack are sparse, so trying to figure out those responsible did or how they did it is not something that's easily done.
